A revised estimate for the cost of new passenger rail equipment for the Grand Valley Transportation Authority comes in well below the agency's original estimate. A revised price tag for the new trains comes in well below the $125 million estimate of the cost of new trains originally set before the Grand Valley Authority Board of Directors. With the revised cost of $34 million, the agency is cutting its projected costs for the first new trains by a third. The board is set to vote April 30 on the plan to purchase 52 new light rail trains for $17.2 million each, replacing the aging LRT system in Grand Rapids. "This project is the most important public transportation project in the history of Kent County and the first up to date light rail system in Michigan," said GVTrans project manager Rob Dickson. GVTrans and the Grand Rapids Transportation Authority own and operate Grand Rapids light rail. "This is the first cost estimate for a modern light rail system in Michigan that does not include a costly tunnel," Dickson said. GVTrans recently also provided a revised price tag for the Grandville Link, a new bus system that will connect downtown Grand Rapids with the airport. GVTrans projects that the project will cost $61 million with an annual operating cost of $3.7 million. GVTrans board member Dan Taylor said the agency is reviewing other projects as well, but is focused on the LRT trains and the Grandville Link. "It's not going to be easy to do," Taylor said. "But we have heard no reason why we can't do it." Taylor said it's important to have future-proof passenger rail that can accommodate the growth of Grand Rapids and the region. "We want to keep the city moving, keep it growing," he said. "So we're going to have to do something." GVTrans board member Janis Kennedy said the board needs more information on the Grandville Link. "We still don't know the cost of the project," she said. "There's still a lot of questions to be answered." Kennedy said the plan to move Grandville voters on the project next Tuesday has her concerned. "I've been contacted by some members of the community who think it's an

In a so-called indirect type of discharge lamp with a double-ended tubular envelope, the envelope is usually sealed to the base by swaging or riveting. However, swaging or riveting of the envelope to the base produces several disadvantages. First, the base of a tubular envelope, when swaged, is discontinuous at its lateral ends. This results in a decreased voltage gradient at the ends of the envelope, thereby causing the ends to be less efficient and may also lead to leakage of the discharge gases within the envelope. For example, in a fluorescent lamp, due to the close physical contact between the envelope and the base, the discharge gases can leak out of the ends of
